

Happy March!

Thanks to everyone who provided testimonials for the I Love WPR project. It's good to have so many loyal fans! Your stories and anecdotes are shared with our congressional delegation as well as with our state legislators.

WPM produces a large number of stories that reflect various aspects of Wyoming. I'd like to bring your attention to a story that caught my ear as I was driving. It's called "A Youth Radio Investigation of Wyoming Role in Climate Change" and focused on a group of Laramie middle schoolers discussing the issue of the environmental impacts of energy development in Wyoming. The story is important for its content, but it goes beyond just content and brings in the voices of the youngest of our constituents to a topic relevant to all. Excellent reporting by Melodie Edwards, Anna Roesler, and Catcher Pannel!

Lastly, activity for our Spring fund drive is starting to gear up. I encourage all of you to renew your membership. Every year is a critical one for public radio. But 2017 is not only critical, it's quite unusual for all the political news NPR and local networks have been reporting. Staying abreast of a very active new administration can be quite consuming! If you value the news and information you receive from WPM and from NPR, be sure to secure its future.

Sincerely,

Christina Kuzmych
