

Once upon a time there was a little house in the village. The little house was so small it could really only fit three people, and that's how many people lived there. But one day those three people invited all of their friends and their friends' friends to live with them in their little house. Before those three people knew it, there were two hundred people living in the little house together. It was full of love, but it was also crowded. Their house and chimney was plump with people. In fact, the house was so plump that people began to pop out of the chimney.

First, two people popped out, and that took a few hours. The house was too full! Soon people started popping out in increasing numbers: three people popped out, then four more, then five, then six, seven, eight, nine, ten, and so on. Before the original three knew it, there was an explosion of twenty people popping out of their chimney.

As they came shooting out of the house, all of the people were injured, and there were not enough ambulances to go around.

They had to call neighboring communities for assistance. One ambulance came all the way from New York City to help.

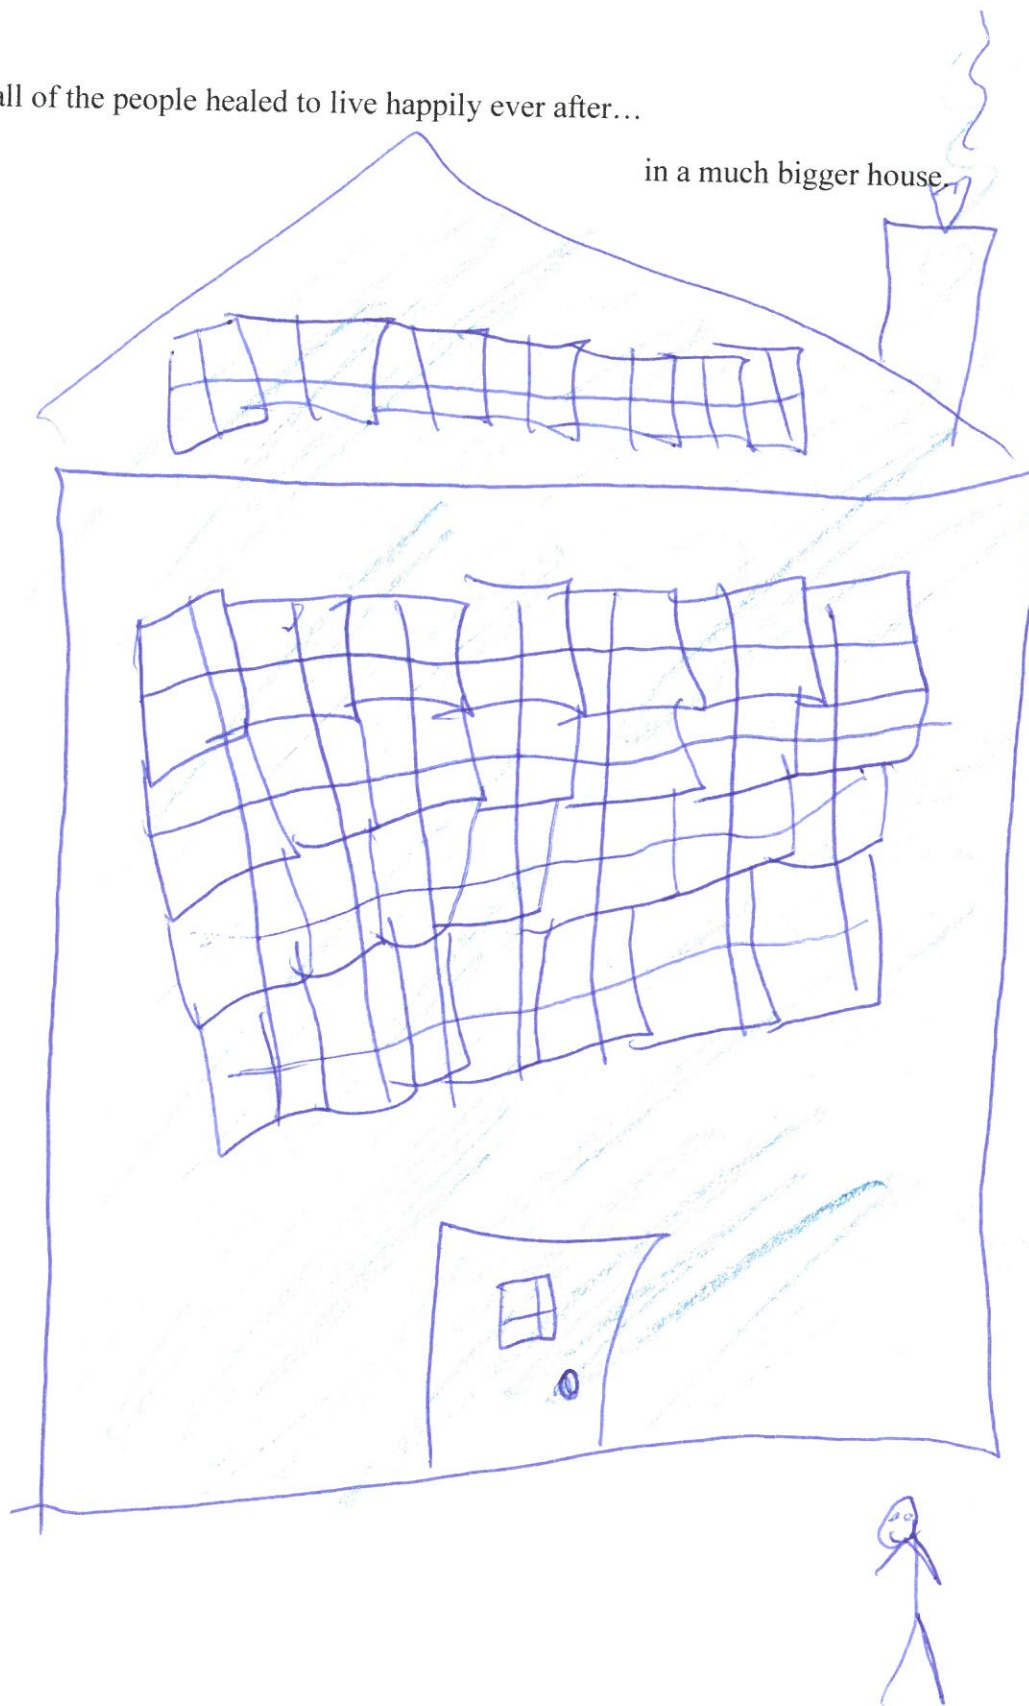

The assisting ambulances worked together as a team to take all two hundred people to the hospital.

In time, all of the people healed to live happily ever after...

in a much bigger house.
